The Entity That Never Dies

Nabek — Off the Ship

August 5, 2026

Colonialism as a living entity. Withdrawal as an act.

I speak from the Island of the Turtle, from the portion illegitimately called [Turtle Island]. I do not speak as a lawyer. I do not speak as a citizen. I speak as a living man, descendant of settlers who broke with the institution in 2022. What follows is not a thesis. It is a conversation between what I know through breath, what I know through earth, and what the courts have written in their grimoires without ever daring to say it all.

I claim no rights. Rights come from the sea. They are commodities exchanged in ports, permissions granted or withdrawn. I live on land. On land, one does not claim. One is. One breathes. One walks. One belongs.

This document is the story of why I got off the ship. Not in revolt. In withdrawal. Not in flight. In choice. I chose the birch-bark canoe. I chose the river. I chose the —

FIRST PART

The Entity That Never Dies

Colonialism is not a past to be lamented. It is a living, artificial entity that mutates instead of dying. From the slave trade to structural debt, from territorial colonization to digital colonization, it is the same logic: extraction, accumulation, erasure of the —

This entity has no body, but it has institutions. It does not openly force; it recruits, indoctrinates, formats. It transforms man into resource, earth into commodity, child into future debt. It makes us believe — that legal identity is the only valid form of existence, that tax is natural, that dignity must be earned through —

I call it a timeless entity. Like those underground fungi that spread for kilometers and survive for thousands of years by changing form above the soil. One day it is a crown, another day it is a corporation, another day it is a digital government. But the mycelium remains the same. It never changes its purpose: to take. Take the land. Take the souls. Take —

The institution practices sacrifice. Not the noble sacrifice, the one made out of love. The mechanical sacrifice, the one made because the machine needs flesh to move forward. It sacrifices children to school. It sacrifices forests to accounting ledgers. It sacrifices memory to the archives it controls. It sacrifices the living to the person —

And it will never acknowledge its wrongs. Never. It is not in its nature. A timeless entity that mutates to adapt and take has no conscience. It has protocols. It does not ask for forgiveness. It recalculates. It rewrites. It erases. It says: I am progress. It says: I am security. It says: without me, chaos. And people believe. Because they have forgotten the taste of the earth. They have forgotten the sound of the river. They have forgotten that chaos is —

Nothing is to be reconciled with such entities. One does not negotiate with a mycelium. One does not make peace with a machine designed to digest. One does not reconcile with a fire that demands wood. One chooses: either one stays in the stomach, or one —

I am —

I am not the only one who got off. Others got off before me. Others will get off after. Some got off without knowing it, simply by refusing to play the game. Some got off weeping. Some got off shouting. I got off in silence. In choosing. In taking myself —

Withdrawal is not flight. It is an arrival. It is the arrival on the shore we had forgotten. It is the arrival in the canoe we had refused to see. It is the arrival in the relationship we had replaced with the —

The withdrawal of consent as an act, not as —

as end, as choosing one's —

Taking oneself in hand!

True speech as obligation,

even when no one —

Offending those who still pay,

who still get indignant,

who still dance the —

Offending by saying,

you are good-people,

ceded-skins,

To signal

a usurped consent?

To recover my dignity,

my Integrity!

is a —

We are committed!

We must —

To heal, to reconcile

one must stop letting the cancer spread

it must be isolated,

It will disintegrate,

by ceasing to feed it

It will become itself forced to capitulate, to disappear, to digest itself!!

WHAT THE JUDGMENTS ADD TO THIS WITHDRAWAL

I say that the withdrawal of consent is an act, not a posture. The judgments, for their part, sketch the structure that makes this act —

In 1803, Marbury v. Madison (5 U.S. 137) established this principle: "A law repugnant to the Constitution is void." A repugnant law is null. Not weak. Not debatable. Null. As if it had never existed. When I say that colonial laws do not bind me, I am not being utopian. I am saying what the law itself secretly admits: when the foundation is rotten, the roof —

In 1886, Norton v. Shelby County (118 U.S. 425) wrote: "An unconstitutional act is not a law." A law that violates the constitution is not a law. It is wind. And wind cannot —

In 1958, Cooper v. Aaron (358 U.S. 1) recalled that every judge swears an oath to the Constitution. Not to the government. Not to the State. To the Constitution. When a judge applies a law that overreaches, he breaks his oath. He no longer acts as a judge. He acts as an individual. Scheuer v. Rhodes (416 U.S. 232, 1974) confirms this: when a judge steps outside his jurisdiction, he is no longer protected. He becomes an ordinary man again, responsible for his —

So when I refuse to obey, I am not refusing justice. I am refusing imposture. The law itself, in its moments of lucidity, draws the limits of its own —

But beware: these judgments speak of their constitutions, their laws. I speak of the earth. I do not claim their rights. I observe that even within their own rules, their house is cracked. I do not need their permission to see the crack. I see it. That is —
